

Rival Frocks of Equal Class

THE FOREMOST American designers concede the wonderful talent of the French. In the conception and making of clothes, but they have arrived at the point of excellence where they are not afraid of comparisons. Here we have an opportunity to consider an American and a French frock, side-by-side, and both made for summertime dress-up occasions, shown with the millinery and footwear selected for them. French costumers are establishing branches of their houses in this country, but it is more significant that Americans are sending millinery and footwear to Paris, and perhaps other things.

From Paris comes the lovely frock of flowered georgette with an accented plaited skirt and plain, short smock, cut in the kimono style with elbow sleeves. The sleeves are turned back in a cuff and a little frill made of the plaited georgette finishes them. Two-toned ribbon with pleated edge makes the loose girle and outlines the square neck, but wider ribbon is used for the bow and single sash end at the side. A bit of French ingenuity is revealed in the smock which develops extra fullness and length at each side. A leghorn hat, fringed and wreathed with ostrich, and satin slippers live up to the requirements of this delightful dress.

Our American costumer has made use of black chantilly flouncing in the rival frock. The skirt, of two flounces, is attached to a plain bodice with full peplum. The long sleeves flare at the wrists and there is a fold of flesh-colored georgette at the front of the square neck. The girle of blue satin ribbon slips under the peplum at the front where two large roses are posed. The strictest of hats, of black malines and narrow ribbon, and black satin slippers with steel buckles are of the same aristocratic class as black chantilly lace.

For Little Girls.

Among the smart tailored frocks recently brought out for little girls, one especially good-looking dress was of tan linen with a cuff hem of dark brown. With this dress a brown straw hat, or a tan-colored one with brown band, and brown shoes and stockings and hair ribbons should be worn. A little blue-and-white striped organdie frock recently seen had stripes of the waist running vertically and of the skirt horizontally. Color combinations are approved, a yellow linen frock having cuffs and collar of lavender linen.

Most men have a grievance against one thing or another. But some, unable to find anything in particular, compromise by making it general, hence the village grocer.
